OUTLOOK AND STRATEGY

Market Review. Global equities posted modest gains in May due to positive economic data, rising vaccination rates and continued policy support. Gains were capped however as inflation fears and the resurgence of the coronavirus weighed on investor sentiment. Eurozone equities outperformed the broad global equity index as the accelerating pace of vaccinations provided support for the reopening of the economy. Emerging markets also rose for the month on the back of a weaker dollar while gains from US equities were tempered by high inflation numbers.

The Federal Reserve kept rates unchanged and maintained its accommodative stance but hinted that it may begin to discuss a plan in scaling back some policies if economic recovery continues to progress toward the committee's goals. In terms of fiscal policy, President Biden unveiled his fiscal budget proposal which included increasing the federal spending to USD 6 trillion in the next fiscal year, rising to USD 8.2 trillion by 2031.

Economic data reflected positive signs of recovery. The US economy expanded at a faster pace as the composite PMI increased to 68.7 from last month's 63.5, driven by the strength in the services sector. Eurozone's business activity grew at its fastest pace in 3 years as the services and manufacturing sector rebounded from the levels during the lockdown. China's PMI reflected a steady recovery with its composite PMI increasing from 53.8 to 54.2 month-on-month driven by new and export orders.

In commodity markets, increased consumer demand from reopening economies ramped up prices for raw materials. Commodity prices surged in May including raw metals, agricultural commodities and crude oil.

Fund Performance. The fund returned 0.29%, lagging the benchmark by 97 basis points. Stock selection and allocation in cash detracted from performance.

Fund Strategy. The COVID-19 pandemic will likely continue to cause volatility and market uncertainty as investors weigh the potential negative consequences to global growth and trade. While there are signs of a recovery in some economic indicators and vaccine deployment under way, we remain cautiously optimistic on global equities. Overall, we have a bias towards high quality companies with healthy free cash flow ratios, strong growth and attractive shareholder returns. From a sector perspective, we have reduced exposure to high growth sectors like Technology due to expected investor rotation into more cyclical sectors. Finally, we like continue to like EM assets as we expect vaccination rates to improve and economic recovery to be under way in 2022.
